Description

Edmund Blampied RBA RE (1886–1966) was brought up by his mother, Elizabeth, a dressmaker and shopkeeper. Artistically talented from a young age, Blampied left Jersey to study at the Lambeth School of Art under Philip Connard RA where his skills as an illustrator were recognised and in 1904 he was recommended for a part-time job on the staff of a national newspaper, the Daily Chronicle. From here he transferred to the London County Council School of Photo-engraving and Lithography, where he developed his skills as an etcher and made a number of friends, including Salomon van Abbe, whose sister, Marianne, he would marry in 1914. Over the following decades Blampied would spend time living in London, but it was on Jersey that he ultimately chose to settle. From 1911 he established a successful studio in London as an independent commercial illustrator, providing drawings for many magazines. Between 1916 and 1919 he was back in Jersey, working in the Royal Jersey Militia during the First World War. Returning to London after the war, Blampied's etchings found new popularity; he was elected an Associate then prestigious Fellow of the Royal Society of Painter-Engravers and Engraver...
