Description

Fine quality 19th Century period mahogany library or desk chairs with horseshoe back. Circa 1860/1870's. Upholstered in brown buttoned leather, with lovely carved mahogany scroll ends on turned legs with castors. The leather seats look original however they have most probably been upholstered around 60 years ago in wonderful brown leather resting on a central splat with 2 angled carved Mahogany supports and rear splayed legs. The front legs have original brass castors. The leather is in great condition, with a great patina and loads of character, with no tears. These chairs have been given a light clean. Great quality with excellent leather and good proportions. During the 19th century, leather library chairs were highly prized and sought-after items in any well-appointed library or study. These chairs were typically crafted from high-quality materials, such as fine-grained leather, hardwood frames, and hand-carved details. One of the defining characteristics of leather library chairs from the 19th century was their deep, plush seats and wide, comfortable armrests. These chairs were designed for long periods of reading or writing, and as such, they had to be both...
