Description

A lovely small painting of a female artist showing her latest work to her client. Oil on panel late 19th century signed with monogram HN Dated 1888 During the 19th century, British women artists faced various challenges when it came to selling their works. The art world at that time was predominantly male-dominated, and societal norms often restricted women's access to professional opportunities. Nevertheless, several strategies were employed by British women artists to sell their artworks: Exhibitions: Women artists participated in exhibitions to showcase and sell their works. They often sought opportunities to exhibit their paintings at prestigious venues such as the Royal Academy of Arts in London, which was the leading art institution of the time. While it was challenging for women to gain acceptance into these exhibitions, some managed to break through and gain recognition. please contact for a shipping quote Alternative exhibition spaces: In addition to traditional institutions, some women artists organized their own exhibitions or participated in alternative venues. They established artist collectives, formed women's art societies, and organized group exhibitio...
