Description

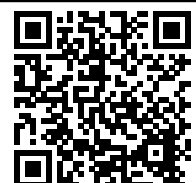

A Very Attractive Early 18th Century, George I Period, Walnut Kneehole Desk Of Diminutive Proportions, Having Extremely Well Figured Quarter Veneered, Crossbanded Top With Elegant Re-Entrant Corners, Over Arrangement Of Seven Drawers Retaining Original Brasswear, Flanking Central Cupboard Door With Original Brass Hinges, Raised On Original Bracket Feet. In general kneehole deeks are regarded as a smaller, more compact version of the more typically found pedestal desk, with some form of an arrangement of drawers around a central set recessed cupboard being the typically found form. There are of course various different designs to be found along the same theme, but as a general rule that is the form you will usually find in a georgian kneehole desk. Although originally designed for the use which the name suggests, as a desk in a spot around the home where perhaps space doesn't suffice for a full size, formal desk, they can of course be utilised in a whole host of different ways including perhaps in a bedroom, or dressing room, as a dressing table with a dressing table mirror placed atop of them. The recessed cupboard combined with the amount of storage available makes the...
