Description

This exquisite pair of porcelain goats hails from the Qing Dynasty, dating back to the 19th century. The goats are realistically modelled in a recumbent position, capturing the essence of tranquility and serenity often associated with these creatures. The porcelain is glazed in a striking turquoise hue, lending the pieces a unique aesthetic appeal that is both vibrant and soothing. The goats are not just fine, but rare, making them a valuable addition to any collection. Their design and craftsmanship echo the rich cultural heritage and artistic traditions of the period they originate from. Interestingly, a similar pair of goats can be found in the esteemed collections of the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam, under the object number AK-RBK-15971-A. This association further underscores the cultural and historical significance of these pieces. In terms of condition, one goat remains in perfect state, preserved as it was centuries ago. The other, while mostly intact, bears the marks of time with slight damage to the tip of one horn and ear. Despite this, the pair together continue to present a harmonious blend of artistry and history. In summary, this pair of turquoise glazed por...
