Description

Antique mahogany extending dining table This Antique mahogany extending dining table was made circa 1835. The cabinetmaker used fine mahogany with an interesting fleck to the grain. The table slides out on oak runners so that it can take any combination of the 4 leaves, so that you can set it to the number of guests you have. It is a comfortable 14 seat table when extended. The dining table stands on the very desirable upturned tulip legs and stands on the original brass cup castors. The frame stays in one place and the top slides open at each end, this allows for you and your guests to easily sit under the table and not having obstructions at the corners. It is a very clever way to get the most seating from a table. Imagine the pride and joy this table will bring to you, especially as you entertain your family and friends around it. It is bound to spark conversations to what would the original owners have chatted about as they sat around this table when it was first placed into a large wealthy owner's home. The 1830's were a fascinating time in Britain's history. Would they be discussing the abolishment of slavery in 1833, or the French Revolution of 1830 was also know...
