Description

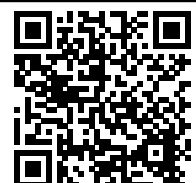

It is rare to find such an amazing, complete brocaded bag, originally used for containing spindles and/or water-pipes, and dating to the second half nineteenth century. Made by the Sangtschuli nomads, a sub-tribe of the Timuri, who occupied the borderlands of north-eastern Persia and north-western Afghanistan, the bag is in fabulous, complete condition. Woven in one piece in different techniques of weft-brocading, the bag was then sewn-up on one side with goat-hair. The goat-hair was also used to complete the top selvedging of the bag and to create a long braided cord for carrying and hanging the bag inside the tent. A truly magnificent and entirely utilitarian bag that has survived the ravages of nomadic life during the 19th century. Size: 49cm x 23cm (1' 7" x 9")
