Description

This spirited late 19th-century oil painting by French artist André Perrachon (1827-1909) depicts a still life with an abundance of yellow and pink roses. Perrachon was a prominent and well-loved painter of flora. Alive, delicately bustling, and bathed in light, they're rendered with the utmost naturalistic effect. They radiate, glowing from inside, and shimmer amid a silvery haze. Perrachon is considered as one of the finest proponents of still life to have emerged from the ancient city of Lyon. He was a rose specialist and praised for his "lightness of touch", which recalled "the masters of the Netherlands". He undertook his early tuition at the local École des Beaux-Arts in Lyon, before heading for the buzzing ateliers of Paris. Here, he trained with two masters - François Lepage (1796-1871) and Pierre-Adrien Chabal-Dussurgey (1819-1902) at the École des Gobelins. The latter was the director of the flower painting workshop at the Manufacture Nationale des Gobelins, a long-established tapestry factory. Both Lepage and Chabal-Dussurgey were talented still life painters, yet offered two distinct styles. Lepage's approach was somewhat grander and more akin to the 17th...
