Description

Impressive classical Roman Empire style vibrant oil on canvas depicting a harbour, ruins, figures and sea, mounted on stretcher within a very decorative swept gilt frame. This painting is a wonderful rendition having good detail and accuracy, a professionally finished work in oil paint on stretched canvas. These type of scenes known as Capriccio were very popular in Rome from the latter half of the 17th century onwards through the 18th and late 19th century period and right up until the mid 20th century. This example is set within a decorative swept 1960-70's frame and is an highly atmospheric work produced in a similar manner to many others over the centuries to provide an account of Christ and the centurion, amongst classical ruins and other local denizens. The combination of the classical ruins and small figures portray the expansiveness of the architecture and scene and demonstrate artist's ability to transcend the talent of perspective. AFTER FRANCESCO LAZARO GUARDI (1712-1793) Was a nobleman born in Venice and specialised in little views of the city. He was a collaborator of Canaletto when he was in his 40's and became later very popular running a large stud...
