Description

This extensive late 17th-century oil painting by Dutch artist Jacob van der Does II (1661-1699) depicts a river landscape with a hunting party, riverside buildings, various craft, a fort, and distant hills. Dating to around 1680, this splendid survivor from the Dutch Golden Age is a feast for eyes. On the left, hunters rest with hounds by a rutted track, cutting through a dense wood. Others ride beyond. While on the right, a winding river snakes through the landscape. It's the lifeblood of the local populace and teeming with activity. In addition to the numerous pockets of interest, the composition offers various routes for the eye to explore. It's a technique that was employed by many of the more accomplished Dutch landscape painters, including Meindert Hobbema (1638-1709). We're taken on a journey, one minute wandering through a wood under a canopy of foliage, the next, traversing a bustling waterway. Born in The Hague to Jacob van der Does the Elder and Margaretha Boortens, van der Does the Younger was initially apprenticed to his father before studying with both Karel Dujardin (1626-1678) and Caspar Netscher (1639-1684). Dujardin was a close friend of his father's...
