Description

The colour and patina on this substantially constructed stool are exceptional. The recessed panel top is made from a well-figured, single plank within a heavily moulded border. Very unusually, this moulding is carved into the tops of the legs to give a more finished, framed appearance which would also allow for a cushion or squab. The well-drawn, ring and baluster-turned legs are joined by a moulded-edge frieze and moulded-top stretchers, on ball feet (one later retipped). There is evidence to suggest that this stool incorporates reused material when constructed around the end of the 17th century. English, circa 1680-1700
