Description

Fabulous late 18th-century/early 19th-century black basalt large bowl, featuring a neoclassical design and engine-turned body. Black basalt is a hard, dense, fine-grained stoneware developed by Josiah Wedgwood in the late 18th century, made from a reddish-brown clay that turns black during firing. This is one piece from a recently acquired collection; look out for the other pieces. Incredibly elegant and displays extremely well. The bowl depicts a basket weave design decoration around the body. No maker's mark, as was common at the time, so it could have been produced by numerous top-quality companies of the era c1800s.
