Description

Free delivery to mainland England and Wales, see below for details. A magnificent and exceptionally heavy mid-Victorian solid mahogany dining table, dating to around 1860. This is a true piece of English craftsmanship from the high Victorian period, when furniture was built for permanence and grandeur. The table is beautifully constructed from dense, richly grained mahogany — the kind of timber now virtually unobtainable — with a mellow honey-brown tone and deep natural sheen that only develops after more than a century of use and polishing. The rounded top has a warm, tactile surface with fine figuring and the gentle undulations typical of aged solid wood. The table stands firmly on four elegant cabriole-style legs, each terminating in a classic pad foot, providing both stability and poise. The underframe is solid and substantial, revealing hand-cut joinery and traditional 19th-century craftsmanship. Beneath, the structure retains signs of honest age and redundant old worm holes, long since treated and completely inactive — a reassuring mark of authenticity rather than concern. The entire piece is extremely solid and heavy, designed in an era when furniture was made to...
