Description

The popularity of antique hall benches, like this fine quality Edwardian example in walnut, can be partly attributed to their position within the home. Often placed close to the front door, they provide support before and after the day's endeavours, and a place to prepare, rest, chat, and ponder. We have attributed this hall bench to the cabinet makers 'James Shoolbred & Co.' of London (established 1820s). As you may gather from the accompanying images, this finely constructed bench, with its warm and appealing surface, will sit comfortably within both contemporary and period interiors. Its attractive refined design does not signify a lack of strength, far from it. It's elegant yet robust, and in remarkable condition, especially when you consider its function over the previous 100 years of use. This antique hall bench is being sold in a professionally restored condition, and as such, it is now ready to join the day-to-day hustle and bustle of your home.
