Description

Type of artwork: Original Antique Watercolour Artist and Signature: Rowland Henry Hill (Staithe Group, 1873–1952) Biography – Rowland Henry Hill (1873–1952) Rowland Henry Hill was a British painter associated with the Staithe Group, a celebrated colony of Northern Impressionists working along the North Yorkshire coast in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. The group was known for its free, spontaneous brushwork, plein-air methods, and honest depictions of rural and coastal life. Hill painted extensively around Whitby, Robin Hood's Bay, Runswick Bay, Hutton-le-Hole, and the inland villages of the North York Moors. His work combines impressionistic colour with a loose, expressive handling of watercolour, often capturing movement, atmosphere and natural light with great immediacy. By the 1940s—when this painting was completed—Hill had refined a more fluid, gestural style. His later works are increasingly sought after for their freshness and sense of place. Pieces depicting specific Yorkshire villages, especially recognisable scenes with architectural markers such as the village cross at Hutton-le-Hole, are particularly desirable to collectors of regional art.
