Description

An Extremely Attractive And Very Charming Early 19th Century Georgian Yew Wood, Ash & Elm Childs Windsor Armchair, The Elegant Hooped Back With Highly Figured Christmas Tree Shaped Pierced Back Splat, Flanked By Turned Upright Supports, Over Well Figured Seat, Raised On Elegant Turned Legs United By Crinoline Stretcher. This beautiful child's windsor chair is constructed from yew wood which is a really good feature and it also boasts a crinoline stretcher. Not all windsor chairs had crinoline stretchers, especially child's examples, and most have standard H stretchers to support the legs, but there is something incredibly elegant about the swept crinoline stretchers. It is believed the term crinoline is borrowed from the crinoline petticoats which 19th century ladies would utilise below their dresses to enhance their silhouette. Generally Windsor chairs are one of the most widely produced, widely used and widely loved items of antique furniture. They come in just about every design, size, quality, timber and period that it's possible to imagine, with windsor chairs still being constructed to this very day and often costing more to purchase than the antique versions.
