Description

A fine and substantial set of eight mid-19th century Scottish dining chairs in beautifully patinated golden oak, stamped John Taylor & Son, Edinburgh, and dating to circa 1860. The chairs feature shaped open backs with gently curved top rails and well-proportioned uprights, displaying the restrained yet refined craftsmanship associated with leading Scottish cabinetmakers of the period. The turned and fluted front legs provide both strength and visual interest, while the overall proportions offer excellent comfort and balance. Each chair is upholstered in rich brown leather, finished with traditional brass studded edging. The presence of the maker's stamp confirms their quality and provenance, with John Taylor & Son being well regarded for their solid construction and attention to detail. These chairs would suit a traditional dining room, library or country house interior, offering both practical seating and period authenticity. The set remains in good antique condition throughout, with expected marks and wear commensurate with age and use, and presents well as a complete and increasingly hard-to-find matching suite. A handsome and characterful set, combining comfort...
