Description

A handsome leather armchair dating to around 1900, full of the depth, wear and quiet authority that only a century of use can create. The chair is upholstered in well-aged, dark leather with a beautifully honest patina—creases, mellowed colour and surface wear that speak to long service rather than neglect. It has the inviting, lived-in look that decorators and collectors prize. Character and craftsmanship • Rolled arms and a gently reclined back give it that classic late-Victorian/Edwardian club-chair silhouette. • Brass-capped castors to the front legs add a touch of period refinement and make it easy to position. • Stud detailing along the lower edge frames the form and highlights the quality of the upholstery work. • The seat is deep and comfortable, with the reassuring solidity of traditional construction. Why it works so well today - This is the sort of armchair that instantly warms a room—perfect for a study, library corner, or as a grounding piece in a contemporary interior that needs a note of heritage. Its worn leather has that effortless authenticity that new reproductions can't imitate. A decorative, atmospheric armchair with real presence, offering both com...
