Description

This late 17th-century still life painting, attributed to Dutch artist Simon Pietersz Verelst (1644-1710/1717) presents an arrangement of flowers gathered within a vase. At its centre, pale roses and softly unfolding blossoms are clustered in a luminous core, their petals delicately modelled with subtle transitions of light. Around them, rich red poppies with translucent petals and smaller pink blooms cascade downward toward the ledge. The painting sits within the Anglo-Dutch still life tradition of the late 17th century, and the handling is particularly exquisite. Petals are built through controlled layering, with gentle highlights - the deep reds are particularly telling, avoiding the later 18th-century tendency toward heightened saturation. Overall, the effect is one whereby light appears diffused rather than arriving from a single source. Flower painting in the Dutch Republic at this time had reached a high level of unparalleled refinement, but by the late 1660s, economic issues pushed many artists to seek opportunities abroad. London, under Charles II, became a natural destination. There, painters such as Simon Pietersz Verelst introduced a distinctly Dutch sensit...
