Description

For sale, a Georgian period glass medical leech jar. Completely undamaged, this rare survivor consists of a glass bowl with folded outswept rim with a capstan stem and pontil mark to the base indicating its early origins. These jars were kept by apothecaries to store leeches used for the purposes of bloodletting on patients, a common practice for centuries and considered a cure for numerous health issues. The jar would have been covered with a layer of muslin to the top and secured with a piece of string around the inverted part of the rim. Circa 1800
