Description

Grand Early Victorian Rosewood Tilt top Table. An exceptionally rare statement piece of the early 19th Century. This remarkably rare English Rosewood tilt-top table, dating from the early Victorian period circa 1840, represents the pinnacle of grand architectural cabinetmaking. Measuring a commanding 1355mm in diameter, the piece was originally designed as a centre table, intended to stand as the principal focal point in the middle of a grand drawing room or library in a substantial country house or townhouse. While its significant scale and robust construction allow it to comfortably serve as a breakfast or intimate dining table for four to six people, its primary historical role was as a social hub for displaying fine objects or serving tea. The table is centred around a massive, solid rosewood pillar featuring deep, precision-cut fluting. This central support is uniquely framed by dramatic carved buttress scroll supports that bridge the pillar to a heavy melon-form bulb, providing a silhouette that is both powerful and elegant. The craftsmanship is further elevated by the table's most distinctive aesthetic feature—a very unusual curved and crossbanded veneered edge t...
