Description

A fine and well-matched pair of antique Gothic Revival five-branch candelabra, circa 1920, of considerable decorative quality and presence. Each candelabrum rises from a square wood plinth applied with diamond stud mounts to each face and raised on small bun feet, through a pierced crown base enclosing a turned ball finial, to a barley-twist stem with Gothic lancet arch supports rising to five scrolling candle arms. Each arm terminates in a tulip-form sconce with gadrooned drip pan - crisp, well-cast, and intact throughout. The Gothic Revival vocabulary is applied with consistency and skill: the crown base, lancet arches, barley-twist column, and tulip sconces all speak a coherent architectural language rooted in the medieval tradition as interpreted by the great Victorian and Edwardian Gothic Revival designers. The warm patina, developed over a century of age, gives these pieces a depth and character that makes them equally at home on a formal dining table, a library mantelpiece, or flanking an altar-style console. A rare matched pair in comparable condition - collector's pieces that would complement any Gothic, ecclesiastical, or period interior. Dimensions (each): ...
