Description

This antique 20th-century Edwardian draw-leaf dining table in oak is a beautifully crafted piece, combining practicality with elegant period design. Very well made and of excellent quality throughout, the table features attractive carved detailing with a high level of craftsmanship and attention to detail. Designed with convenience in mind, the table extends easily by means of two concealed drawleaf sections, allowing additional dining space whenever required while neatly storing away beneath the main top when not in use. The table is supported by a sturdy refractory-style base, giving it a distinctive and substantial presence. The oak displays a lovely warm colour and character throughout, further enhancing the table's timeless appeal. Presented in very good condition, this highly desirable Edwardian dining table would make a wonderful centrepiece for any dining room or kitchen. Four matching chairs are also available in a separate listing for those wishing to complete the set.
