Description

An eighteenth-century carved oak figure depicting a youthful male in flowing Classical drapery. The figure is carved in the round and stands in a relaxed contrapposto pose, the drapery arranged in bold folds across the body and over one shoulder. The carving displays strong character, with a well-modelled head, expressive facial features and confident treatment of the drapery. Originally intended as a decorative, architectural or emblematic element, the figure now survives as a striking piece of period sculpture in its own right. Retaining a rich aged surface and excellent decorative presence, the figure stands on a later associated plinth. Some repairs to feet and on loss of thumb on right hand. Measuring: 57 cm height overall
