Description

An unusual set of four painted wooden panels depicting British soldiers from different regiments dating back to 1572, each inscribed to the reverse with details of the regiment portrayed and the relevant date. The painted panels bear certain similarities to the work of E. V. Howell, the British officer and artist who, following injuries sustained during the First World War, produced a series of painted military figures on wooden boards. Whilst no direct attribution is suggested, as his style cut out soldiers standing on a base, the present group shares a comparable format and spirit, and may similarly have been created by a serving or former soldier with a particular interest in military history and regimental dress. Measurements: 21.5 cm x 14 cm (each) British, early 20th century
