Description

A handsome early 19th-century bleached oak serving or hall table dating to around 1830, displaying wonderful colour, texture, and a richly developed patina. The rectangular plank top sits above a simple frieze and is raised on four beautifully carved Gothic Revival legs, whose architectural detailing gives the piece a distinctive presence and period character. The bleached finish enhances the natural grain of the oak while preserving the table's authentic antique appeal. Elegant yet practical, it would make an impressive hall table, console, serving table, or display piece in both traditional and contemporary interiors. Features Circa 1830 Solid oak construction Attractive bleached finish Rich, naturally aged patina Decorative Gothic Revival carved legs Generous proportions with excellent presence Ideal as a hall, console, or serving table A characterful and versatile antique table, combining strong Gothic Revival influence with the warmth and craftsmanship of early 19th-century oak furniture.
