Description

English Victorian copper saucepan or milk pan with hand-beaten body, forged iron handle and riveted joints. A superb piece of 19th-century Kitchenalia with wonderful weight, colour and authenticity - the kind of pan that once simmered broths, custards and preserves in a busy country kitchen. Why We Love This ... This is the kind of copper pan that instantly transports you into a Victorian kitchen: the warmth of the range, the scent of slow-cooked dishes, the rhythm of daily life unfolding around a hardworking hearth. Made from very heavy hand-beaten copper with a forged iron handle and riveted joints, it has all the hallmarks of genuine 19th-century craftsmanship. And there is a particular pleasure in caring for old copper — the slow, circular motion of burnishing, the way the metal responds beneath the cloth, and the moment that deep, warm lustre emerges. It's a ritual that connects us to generations of cooks who valued not only the function of their tools, but the beauty of them. This pan rewards that same attention today, just as it did in the Victorian kitchen it once served. Whether used decoratively or functionally, it brings a sense of heritage, atmosphere and auth...
