Description

This is a scarce late Georgian cut glass pickle jar dating from the beginning of the 19th century, c1830. The jar is in excellent condition for its age. It shows age related wear and tear to the base consistent with some 200 years of age and use. The body of the jar is cylindrical, and is has been wheel-cut with prism cuts at the shoulders above a wide band of hobnail diamonds above a prism cut and a basal band of finger flute cutting. It measures 9.5 cm (3.8 inches) in diameter at its widest point. The base is star-cut to the edge. The lid is of radially cut mushroom form, and is probably the original. Assembled, the jar measures 13 cm (5.2 inches) in height. There are a number of tiny flea-bite chips to some of the cut facets, including the edge of the lid peg. There are no other chips, cracks, scratches or any evidence of restoration. A rare survivor in excellent condition for its type. It weighs in at 525 g. (~ 1 lb. 3 oz.).
