Description

A captivating example of Georgian craftsmanship, this rare English antique brooch dates to around 1800 and is crafted in unmarked silver (tested), as is typical of jewellery from this early period. The centrepiece is a beautifully polished moss agate tablet, prized for its remarkable natural inclusions that resemble delicate landscapes or moss suspended within the stone. No two pieces of moss agate are ever alike, making this brooch a truly unique treasure with its own distinctive character. The agate is elegantly framed in silver and adorned with finely applied scrollwork, while matching silver ball finials complete the refined design. The hinged pin is made from nickel for added strength and durability, ensuring the brooch remains both secure and wearable. With its timeless elegance and understated beauty, this authentic Georgian brooch is a wonderful addition to any antique jewellery collection. Whether worn on a jacket, coat, scarf or dress, it brings over two centuries of history and craftsmanship to a contemporary wardrobe. Equally, it would make a thoughtful and distinctive gift for a collector or lover of fine antique jewellery. Pieces of genuine Georgian jewel...
