Description

A really beautiful George I period oak and elm refectory table with three original long planks to the top of an excellent warm colour and with a deep and natural patinaion with cleated ends and some old nicks, worm and bruises to the edges of the boards – the worm long since treated dead and not affecting strength or structure. . The top set on a wide apron uniting substantial oak legs with chamfered corners. This table originally had a box stretcher but this has been adapted to create a central stretcher – many years ago and appears to be a 19th century alteration. It is very common to see the move to a central stretcher on these very old tables because box stretchers make it difficult to position chairs and to push them under when not in use. . The table is extremely heavy. The top lifts off for transport. . The table seats ten easily and is shown here with a set of eight Arts and Crafts oak and walnut chairs attributed to the Glasgow School, Wylie and Lockhead, and which are available separately. . This is a stunning large and early English refectory table . . Dimensions are: . 9ft / 108 inches long, 28.75 inches wide and 29.5 inches high. From floor to lowest point of...
