Description

DESCRIPTION This is an elegant George III satinwood work table, dating from around 1800. Of unusual octagonal form, the table is beautifully veneered throughout in richly figured satinwood and stands on slender square tapering legs terminating in the original brass socket castors. The hinged top opens to reveal a useful storage compartment, while the front is fitted with two drawers, balanced by matching dummy drawers and decorative panels to the remaining sides, each retaining its original lion mask ring handles. The hinged top opens to reveal its original satin-lined fitted interior, retaining the arrangement intended for sewing and needlework accessories. The survival of the original interior is an increasingly uncommon feature and adds considerably to both the authenticity and appeal of the piece. The refined proportions, delicate tapered legs and restrained neoclassical design are characteristic of the finest English cabinet making of the late Georgian period. Originally intended as a work or sewing table, it also makes an attractive lamp table or occasional table, offering useful storage within a compact footprint. A particularly decorative and highly versatile Ge...
