Description

An Extremely Attractive, Very Good Quality And Relatively Rare Pair Of Early 19th Century Regency Period, Birdseye Maple Veneered Occasional Side Tables, Or End Tables, Each Having Superbly Figured Rectangular Tops And Friezes, Raised On Unusual And Elegant Triple Turned Column End Supports With Ebonised Turnings, United By Low Central Stretchers And Raised On Original Carved Scrolling Feet. Birdseye maple was one of the most fashionable and highly prized decorative timbers employed by cabinet makers during the Regency period, its distinctive figuring and wonderfully warm golden colour making it particularly desirable for the production of fine quality furniture. This pair are particularly unusual in their construction, with the triple column end supports creating an extremely elegant and architectural appearance. The contrasting ebonised turnings provide further decorative interest, whilst the low central stretchers give strength and balance to the overall design without detracting from their elegant appearance. Occasional tables of this type were produced in relatively small numbers during the Regency period and it is very unusual to find a genuine pair like this sti...
