Description

A handsome antique mahogany tilt top dining table, dating from the late Victorian period, circa 1890 and displaying strong influences from the elegant furniture designs of the English Regency period. The table features a generously proportioned rectangular top with beautifully rounded corners and a moulded edge. It is supported by an impressive central pedestal with finely reeded and fluted detailing, terminating in four elegant swept legs. Each leg is similarly reeded and finished with a brass cap and castor, giving the table a particularly refined appearance. One of its most attractive and practical features is the traditional tilt-top mechanism. The tabletop can be released and raised into a vertical position, allowing the table to occupy considerably less floor space when not in use. The underside retains its traditional construction and brass fitting. The mahogany has developed a wonderfully rich character over many decades. The tabletop displays considerable historic patina, including surface marks, scratches, variations in colour and areas of wear consistent with age and use. We consider these part of the character of the piece and have deliberately not over-re...
