Description

This exquisite bronze patinated sculpture by Edward Augustus Clapp, dated 1919, captures a tender moment of childhood innocence, depicting two children bathing. One child stands confidently atop a rock, embodying a sense of playful exploration, while the other crouches below, their expression filled with joy and curiosity. The naturalistic details in their figures showcase Clapp's skill in capturing the human form, emphasizing the softness of their skin and the dynamic flow of water. The sculpture's rich patina enhances its depth, inviting viewers to appreciate the intricate textures and forms. Signed by the artist, this piece not only reflects Clapp's artistic vision but also symbolizes the carefree spirit of youth in a serene, playful interaction with nature. Edward Augustus Clapp was affiliated with several art organizations during his career. Notably, he was a member of: 1. The National Academy of Design - A prestigious institution in New York, showcasing American art. 2. The National Sculpture Society - This organization promotes the art of sculpture in the U.S. and supports sculptors through exhibitions and advocacy. These memberships reflect his recognition in the...
