Description

A set of twelve highly decorative late 18th century (circa 1780) naively painted pine panels depicting St Michael the Archangel slaying the dragon or possibly St George, probably originally from a screen. Each of the panels depicting St Michael slaying the dragon, each having a red and blue painted design framing the main image with four of the panels depicting an armorial behind the figure of St Michael. The panels have been framed with a rounded dull blue moulded edge to match the parting bead and also to tone with the colours of the panels and to enable them to be easily hung onto a wall. The panels are quite difficult to date as this type of construction spanned over many years from 1750-1820. Although the panels seem to be of English construction, the style of painting appears to be more that of Asian or Russian due to how the faces of the figures are depicted. This set of panels are in good condition for age with some evidence of wear which can be viewed on the images, they are of stable construction and can go straight into a home. Size: height and width does vary slightly, largest listed: Height: 27" / 68.5cm Width: 14" / 35.5cm Depth: 1.5" / 3.5cm
