Description

Circa 1900-1920, this spelter winged cherub wall light was always made for electricity, and still has its original torchere glass shade. The light measures 55cm in length (including the shade) and has a backplate of 21cm in length. The back plate has a small bar at the back which may not be visible in the last photo, and it also has an open square where it can be attached to the wall. The total distance from the backplate out to the front of the shade when fitted, would be approximately 25cm. The cherub has little wings on his back and is holding a bow in one hand, and the light in the other. Both the cherub, surrounds and glass shade are all in very good condition. We will be putting a clear polish over the piece to keep the metal clean and to enhance the colours, and we have just had the light rewired to UK specifications. Postage and packing within the UK mainland has been included in the price, but for outside areas and abroad, please contact us to give you a quote for delivery.
