Description

Lovely example of an English country house Rosewood framed armchair dating from the early 19th Century. It is an elegant shape with curved arms on turned front supports terminating in brass castors. The chair is covered in a velvet material, believed to be original, which has worn over time to produce a wonderfully faded dusty colour. The chair is in good overall condition. It runs well on its castors and is a good sturdy chair. There are some general age related marks and small knocks around the legs but nothing detrimental. The upholstery has been thoroughly cleaned and although worn it is not damaged and doesn't have any major marks. The most noticeable wear is at the end of the arms where it has been gripped over many years and there is a small section of braid here that is missing. The chair displays beautifully with a charming english country grandeur look. The best description comes from the photos so please look at them all carefully and if you have any questions please ask.
