Description

An interesting 13th-14th century Norman limestone head wearing a typical Norman hat and bearing traces of polychrome in the hair. Originally I think this would have been a full figure that probably resided in a niche. Interestingly with this piece the irises are carved which can be faintly made out under the correct lighting. The head is mounted on a mahogany base but can be removed easily. The overall condition is reasonably good for something of this age, however there are losses and damages commiserate with age, overall a very interesting fragment. overall height of the head on the base is 27cm Base is around 15cm square.
