Description

William IV leather button back reclining patent library chair This William IV leather reclining patent library chair, was made in the workshops of R.P.Chaplin, of Frith Street, London. I have tried to research the cabinetmaker, but I have not had any luck in this. I have seen Filmer chairs with a similar patent, and wonder if Chaplin joined Filmer and transferred the patent to him at a later date. This is a magnificent chair, with a very clever patent mechanism that goes back into its upright position once you move off it. Hidden in the library chairs frieze to the front is a pull out slide, that allows you to lift the leather leg rest into place before you sit back and relax. We have completely restored this superb chair, including totally upholstering it. We have covered it in fine leather, that we hand dye in antique green . The back is deep buttoned with the wing head rests to each side. The hundreds of brass studs are not only very decorative, adding to the final rich look, they are important to help secure the leather to the frame. Each stud is tapped in individually, not only time consuming but also a most skilled job. The chair is finally finished with our unique ...
