Description

A Fine Irish Rosewood Davenport dating from 1840-1850. Constructed using the finest rosewood veneers. The desktop of serpentine form has an inclined lifting top with inset leather surface. The beautifully constructed rise and fall interior consists of two banks of four graduating drawers flanking central gothic arches with drawers above. The pigeonhole arches are finely made with detailed column and base. The galleried top formed of pretty spindles representing an architectural balustrade. This ingenious design allows for the fitted interior to rise up when in use by the press of a button and likewise be pushed down for storage if so wished. Both the pigeonholes and drawers provide useful storage. Kneehole opening height is 24 inches. The desktop stands on a base section with arched panels, one of which being a door enclosing four secret drawers. The desktop is further supported to its front by the finest of cabriole legs. Having exceptional carving to their tops and especially the knee section, with naturalistic decoration of petals and blossoms. Terminating on finely carved and detailed claw and ball feet. The whole standing on recessed castors. This desk owes its name ...
