Description

An Early 19th Century Georgian Mahogany Baby Pembroke Table Having Shaped And Crossbanded Two Flap Top Above Frieze Drawers To Front And Reverse With Inlaid Decoration Raised On Elegant Turned Legs (Pembroke tables became one of the most popular pieces of furniture around the mid-18th century due to their versatility and plethora of different uses. In fact George Hepplewhite himself actually described Pembroke tables as the most useful of tables and many references can be found to them in the literature of the time with people such as Jane Austen even describing them being used for dining at, or having papers kept in them to use them as a writing table and there is even reference to them in other places as being used for ladies to do their embroidery at. It is certain that they are incredibly versatile even in today's world and can be used for many, many different purposes. The ability to use the two flaps to create significant variation in the size of the table top surface is certainly a popular feature. This table is actually referred to as a "Baby Pembroke" table and this is due to the fact it is of course smaller in proportion than its full size siblings. These are ...
