Description

We are delighted to have acquired and be able to offer this stunning English Georgian solid silver salver tray made by William Eaton in London, 1818. This salver, whilst relatively compact in size, presents the grandest and magnificent features of the Rococo revival period (approx 1811-1830 England). To begin with, the entire salver is crafted with a very good gauge of silver - a thick, heavy and sturdy feel is apparent upon holding in person. The outer cast border is made in Rococo fashion with the incredibly ornate and artistic decoration of flowers, leaves and stippled motifs. Equally matching, the three feet of the salver are made in the most desirable form with an exquisite design of further floral decorations. The centre of the salver is presented 'plain', creating the most wonderful aesthetic contrast between the embellished border and mirror-like surface upon which a magnificent coat of arms have been hand engraved. The engraving is the martial arms of Wildman and Oakes. The versatile shape and size of this salver allows for many modern-day uses, none less than for sweets, cards, jewellery and any further creative ways you may come up with. Th...
