Description

Kamo, a small village in central Persia, were famous for their dining sofrehs, all woven from the 19th century through to the early 20th century. The dining sofreh was placed on the floor of the tent or mud-brick dwelling at mealtimes and when guests were present, and bowls of food, bread and chai were placed upon the sofreh. Tribespeople would then sit around the sofreh cross-legged, and eat. This stunning sofreh was made during the early 20th century in Kamo, and appears to have an 'eye' in the centre, symbolically for warding off evil spirits. I particularly love the protrusions pointing in to the 'eye' - wonderful artistic movement. The crease in the centre is simply a fold mark which will be removed. Size: 1.22m x 0.96m (4' 0" x 3' 2").
