Description

A Superb Quality And Extremely Attractive 18th Century, Chippendale Period, Georgian Mahogany Kneehole Desk, Having Well Figured Rectangular Top Over Slide, Central Cupboard And Arrangement Of Drawers, Retaining Original Rococo Brass Handles, Raised On Original Shaped Bracket Feet. Generally, kneehole deeks are regarded as a smaller, more compact version of the more typically found pedestal desk, with some form of an arrangement of drawers around a central set recessed cupboard being the form which one can expect to come across. There are of course various different designs to be found along the same theme, but as a general rule that is the form you will usually find in a georgian kneehole desk. Although originally designed for the use which the name suggests, as a desk in a spot around the home where perhaps space doesn't suffice for a full size, formal desk, they can of course be utilised in a whole host of different ways including perhaps in a bedroom, or dressing room, as a dressing table with a dressing table mirror placed atop of them. The recessed cupboard combined with the amount of storage available makes them absolutely perfect for this. Often mahogany variat...
