Description

Georgian style extending dining table This Georgian style mahogany twin pillar dining table was made using fine timber from redundant tables, circa 1920. We purchased this table from the estate of an local aristocratic family. When this fine dining table was crafted, there were countless old tables with fine timber not wanted, the cabinetmakers could choose from the selection good redundant timber to make into these fantastic dining tables. They would then construct fine pillar bases to compliment the wonderful rich mahogany tops with the interesting, flecked grain. All the best trees had been felled during the 18th and 19thc. sadly, they were not replanted, this meant that to find the best grades of timber a recycling of the material available was required. The other bonus for the cabinetmakers was that the redundant tables were very cheap compared to new timber. Therefore, the cabinetmakers could use this dense timber instead of the softer mahogany available. The mahogany top stands on the pair of pillars with the quadruple splay legs coming off the gun barrel turned column, with the claw toes with rolling castors below. The top with the square ends and rounded corners ...
