Description

We are delighted to offer this wonderful set of four exemplary Onslow pattern salt spoons made c.1760. Surviving over approximately 250 years through the ups and downs of history, this set of four salt spoons has remained in good condition and together. The Onslow pattern features a cast scroll terminal with a tapered stem, connecting a shell-shaped/scalloped bowl on the other end. Classically elegant and presenting an understated English Georgian II style, this set would grace a preexisting collection of fine silverware, salt cellars or even as a unique conversation starter within a dining set - exhibiting a delightful balance of practicality for serving condiments and historic value. Despite its originally intended use for salt, why not get creative and use these spoons in unique modern ways such as serving caviar, spices or even as a little espresso spoon? The maker's (indistinct) mark and the lion passant are present on all four spoons on the stem. The marks are quite worn due to age and only feature these two marks as commonly found on small wares of this period.
