Description

A good example of an antique enamel pendant light with glass bowl. It dates from the late 19th century and would have originally been a gas light in a railway station. It has now been converted to electric and takes a standard bayonet bulb. It is in good condition and displays well. There is some wear and chips in places to the enamel but no major damages. It has been rewired to modern standards and is ready to install. We would always recommend that the light is checked and installed by a professional electrician. Approximate Measurements: Diameter of shade : 12" (30cm) Height : 18" (46cm) The best description comes from the photos so please look at them all carefully and if you have any questions just ask.
